NATURAL HISTORY.

THE ZEBRA OF THE PLAIN.

The Zebra is one of the most beautiful quadrupeds. Nothing is wanting to the grace of the horse and antelope of the stage, a peculiar combination of colours, that contribute its appearance admirable. The animal is rather larger than the common ass, and bears some resemblance to the mule.—The head is of moderate size, and well formed; the ears long, the lips delicate, the body graceful, and the beauty of its shape heightened by the smoothness of the skin. The color is either milk-white, or faintly tinged with brown, or pale ferruginous, and the whole animal adorned with alternate pale and fuscous bands, disposed with such amazing regularity, as to have rather the appearance of art than nature. The stripes run in a transverse direction, both on the body and limbs. The head is striped with fine bands of black and white, forming a centre in the forehead. The neck is adorned with stripes of the same, running in the same direction as those on the back, all which point perpendicularly towards the belly. The thighs and legs are fascinated transversely with fuscous. The tail is of moderate length, round, rather slender, marked with blackish bands, and terminated by a thick tuft of brown hair. The colors in the male are remarkably vivid, being sometimes of a fine yellow or yellowish, with the stripes nearly black; the female is almost white, with the stripes brown. These animals are found in the hotter regions of Africa, from Ethiopia to the Cape of Good Hope; and are, in particular, met with in great plenty in the extensive solitary wastes of the latter tract of country. They live in large herds, and possess much of the manners both of the horse and the ass: are excessively swift and vigilant, and prefer subsisting on the hard and dry herbage their sterile haunts afford, to descending into the more fertile, and more frequented plains. The disposition of the Zebra is more unmanageable than that of either horse or ass; and even such as have been taken when very young have evinced the same invincible degree of passion for liberty when grown up, as those caught at an age of maturity. The Dutch have taken great pains to train them for domestic purposes, but with little success, and which is the more to be regretted, as the domestication of these animals would be of essential service to the colony.

The Zebras transported into the temperate climates of Europe, have been known to produce young, but their offspring degenerate. It has been known to couple with the Arabian horse, and to give birth to a mongrel mule, not very unlike the hybrid creature formed between the horse and the ass. According to Sparrman, the Zebra is hunted by the Hottentots for the sake of the flesh, which they deem excellent; but in reality, it is in no respect superior to that of the horse. The cry of the Zebra, according to Le Vaillant, is very singular.

LINES,

On the death of Miss Elisa Stearns, of Philadelphia.

She died—the gentle life and passed,
Ere sorrowing escaped her tongue
For heaven were to her view.
Her weeping friends the kindly chear'd—
But, as they felt her more endear'd,
Their grief redoubled too.

Calm and resigned the maiden lay,
While pass'd her spotless soul away,
Save when her sweet lips murm'd
To comfort, ere she took her flight,
Those left in this shade of night,
The friends she dearly lov'd.

That voice I do remember well—
For it was one whose gentle swell
Exhalted thoughts of Heaven.
To mild utterance ne'er thick, hesitant,
Slipped each a being innocent
He one would be forgiven.

Since then—and oft it seems, to have
A world of care and woe
Yet never an eye has drept a tear
To think that one so justly dear,
Should leave us here below.

O. G.

STANZAS.—By H. M.

When the merry dance is wreathing,
When the melting song is breathing,
When the eye with pleasure beaming,
And the world all joyous seeming,
When the heart, with rapture warm,
Throbs in answering heart to meet—
Feeling form to break the spell,
That bids youth's trusting bosom swell.

But, when silent tears are flowing,
When the flesh of pain is glowing,
When the heart its cypress wreath,
And the world a wasse appeareth,
When the hopes that lured us on,
Gaily, falsely, all are gone—
Then 'tis time to break the spell,
And point where fadeless pleasures dwell.

ELLA AUBREY;

OR THE MAGIC OF MUSIC.

Ella Aubrey was every thing that is amiable in woman—fair, beautifully proportioned—her lip ever crowned with smiles—her deep blue eyes so full of innocent animation. Her fascinating loveliness had won many hearts, but of that many, none were greeted with so sweet, though tremulous welcome, so bright a smile, as Edgar Morris. Mild, generous, and noble; possessed of every external or mental quality which could charm the soul or attract the eye, no wonder that her young heart so soon owned a reciprocity of feeling; and when the sentiments of his heart were disclosed to her, she blushed and smiled sweet. Open as day to all the soft and amiable feelings of the soul, what she felt her sincerity thought not of disguising. Charmed with her innocent frankness, his affection increased every day; and for a short time there appeared no interruption to their happiness, but it was doomed to be too soon clouded. Ella was the daughter of Mr. Aubrey, by a former marriage. The second wife of his joys and grief, (in rather of his property) likewise had a daughter by a preceding marriage. Henrietta was in every respect the reverse of Ella. Art, deceit, and selfishness, were as conspicuous in the character of the former as simplicity, sincerity and disinterestedness, were in that of the latter.

Henrietta had always looked upon Edgar Morris as a desirable match for herself, and it was during her absence from home, on a visit to a friend in ——, that his attachment for her sister had been revealed; and it was a communication from her mother to that effect, which had hastened her return. Herself and mother, therefore, (who had always been reckoned an excellent hand at a plot,) immediately concerted a plan to supplant Ella and bring about the desired event. She was therefore never permitted to see her lover, except in the presence of her sister, who always found some trivial excuse for being present during his visits. She also contrived to have him a letter with him, in which she artfully assported the unexpecting Ella, and with such seeming reluctance, and well counterfeited sincerity and delicacy, that Edgar was staggered. She expressed great concern and sorrow, that he should be the dupe of an artful girl, (such as she represented Ella,) who did not appear to have any regard for him, but in private made him the constant object of ridicule and sneers; and then apparently excusing her as a spoiled child, and one whose affections had been previously thrown away on a most definite character, who was the confidant of the whole family but herself, the knowledge of which caused her father to threaten his eternal curse, if she married him. "There is, however, some extenuation of her conduct," she continued, "in her extreme youth, but I grieve for you, dear Edgar, for whom I already feel all the affection of a sister; but there may be a great change wrought by your kindness and attentions after you have married her, (if she has any remaining feeling to appreciate it,) and for your sake, Edgar, I sincerely hope it may be so." A low sigh here escaped her, and putting her handkerchief to her eyes, she artfully retired to conceal the absence of tears.

This revived the recollection of a similar story which had reached Edgar, previous to his introduction to the Aubrey family. Hitherto he had supposed it related to Henrietta, (which was in reality the case,) as Ella must have been at that time almost too young to have entered into any matrimonial engagement, for he remembered her then as a mere school girl; but he had now learned the truth, from one who, had it been herself, would have forebore to mention the circumstance, and who could have no object in communicating any thing which could lead to disadvantage to one so nearly connected with her, and who evidently regretted the necessity (or rather her sense of justice) which compelled her to betray it. He therefore at length grew evidently cool, and the unsuspicious girl remained long in ignorance of the cause. She very naturally attributed it to a change in his sentiments, but could not determine what could have produced so sudden a revolution in his feelings. She could not believe in a transfer of his affection to her sister, to be laid known, for both at the same time; but the blight dissolved without fear of a change. Her cheek soon lost its wonted bloom, and her lip its freshness—her laugh no longer resounded through the house. Her father noticed the change and endeavored to rally her drooping spirits, little suspecting the cause, still supposing the engagement between Edgar and herself (which he fully sanctioned) existed as formerly. He was naturally a fond father, but his close attention to his business, had prevented him from noticing many little unkindnesses which were received by his daughter from her mother-in-law and sister; and she was too meek and gentle to offer resistance or complaint, so he remained in ignorance of many things which passed beneath his roof.

At length, accidently overhearing a part of a conversation between Mrs. Aubrey and Henrietta, Ella learned the treachery which had been practised against her. Hitherto their schemes had succeeded admirably. Edgar had indeed never made love to Henrietta, but she flattered herself he could not much longer resist her charms if he were once entirely detached from her sister; and the rupture of this connection caused very nearly accomplished, for he sometimes saw her and scarcely noticed her presence, but directed his attention entirely to Henrietta. His heart had in reality, never been estranged from the innocent Ella; and frequently on observing her ingenuous face, it would make him uncomfortable, and he would determine to solicit an explanation, but the smiling idea that she had or still loved another, and her supposed art and coquetry, would again rise before him and deter him.

One day Ella happened to be present, and Edgar had treated her with the most marked and indignant coolness, which she returned with interest, approaching him in her heart, for believing so easily and without enquiry, the base falsehoods he had been told of her, when the attention of all present was arrested by a female voice from the opposite house, accompanying the piano with a soft and plaintive air. The words were distinctly heard and were as follows:

Thou saidst that thou
Worldst love me, and forever, and my heart
Unconscious, dreamt not that we e'er must part!
Where art thou now?

I could have breathed
My heart sigh, my dying prayer for thee,
Not mourn'd at my fate, but thou to be
By thy abandoned!

'Tis well, 'tis well!
Those charms once loved are fleeting like away;
The heart—it cannot curse, but only say
Farewell!—farewell!

But yet, should ever
Thy footsteps stray to where this form is laid,
Think of her, whose fond heart then'st betrayed
Give one sad tear!

The voice of the singer died away, and Edgar stole a glance at the neglected Ella. A tear trembled in her eye, which she endeavored to conceal. A sigh escaped him—perhaps a doubt that the assertions her sister had made were untrue, suggested itself; perhaps a hope that it was so, at this moment lingered at his heart.—That fear had revived all his former tenderness. The sigh which the recurrence of former feeling had called from him was not unheeded by Ella. She raised her head, their eyes met, and in that one look all was explained. It was too much for the excited nerves of Ella, and before Henrietta had perceived that which was likely to be a death blow to her hopes, Ella had burst into tears and left the room. The deceived Edgar, forgetful in his desire of a reconciliation of every thing else, flew after, and detained her, before she was aware of his object, had made a thousand apologies, and asked a thousand questions with the rapidity of lightning. The remaining actors in the scene, looked awkwardly enough on each other. Henrietta's passion could scarcely be restrained to set all her plans then nicely frustrated. The mother was furious, but it was all unheeded by the lovers. In the explanation that followed, Edgar soon detected the base deceit which had been practised against the innocent and lovely Ella, and never desisted till he had overcome every obstacle, and obtained the forgiveness (for she could not withhold it after discovering the various stratagems which had been resorted to, in order to separate her from her lover) and hand, of her whose heart he could no longer doubt he possessed.

The leading incidents of the above little story are strictly true.

LADY JANE GREY,

OR,

A Picture of Political Religion in the 16th Century.

[Concluded.]

England at the death of Edward VI., presented a singular spectacle. A recent revolution in not only religious opinion, but on the outward forms of the church had deeply affected the civil constitution and laws. This revolution was far from commenced, when the nation was exposed to the evils of a disputed succession to the crown. Seven hundred and twenty-six years had elapsed since the foundation of the monarchy of England by Egbert,* during which long period 41 kings had reigned, he inclusive and 28 after the Norman conquest. Through the succession of females in certain supposed cases, in the crown was admitted, with the exception of Matilda, daughter of Henry I., as women had never presumed to actually claim the sceptre. Matilda never was, correctly speaking, at the head of the government, therefore at the death of Edward VI. a new and very remarkable scene opened. The succession to the crown was disputed by four women.

The Tudors had reigned despotically, but it was found that the fundamental laws of the monarchy regulated their force, the moment the measure was removed. Of the four claimants, if the people had been left free to name the successor independent of their attachment to the laws of their fathers, the Princess Mary would have been, from all the evidence of history, the last choice. As far as known to the native Lady Jane Grey was no object of love and admiration, while Mary counted four even in the minds of her own sect, the Roman Catholics; but every sound mind, of all sects felt the injustice, the illegality, and folly of the acts of succession in both the preceding reigns, and were as an especial manner disgusted with that by which the real heir was set aside in favor of the Dudley family; for it was evident if Lady Jane had been acknowledged queen, that the rule was left to Dudley, Duke of Northumberland.

Therefore, there was a palpable infringement of the laws of the land, the last Letters Patent of Edward VI., derived no sanction from the zeal of all law, public sentiment. Again, it contained contradictions not less glaring than those into which Henry VIII. had fallen. Edward adopted the act declaring Mary and Elizabeth illegitimate, and at the same time annulled, by his own authority, the act conferring on his father the power to regulate the succession; whilst yet, on the other side, he conformed to the Will of Henry VIII. in giving the preference to the children of the second sister of his father.

Agreeable to all here human or divine, allowing her legitimacy, Mary Tudor was queen of England at the demise of her brother, and if declared illegitimate, the crown devolved on Elizabeth. Excluding the latter, opened the throne at once to the queen of Scotland, as grand daughter and sole representative of Margaret, eldest sister to Henry VIII.

The pretension of Jane Grey, being supported by the Letters Patent made in her favor by Edward VI. approved by all the members of the Council and by most of the Judges of the Kingdom, had the appearance of great force, but was in reality extremely contingent. Public judgment was pronounced, that both Kings, their Councils and Parliaments had exceeded their powers, and that otherwise, Edward VI. and his ministers were notoriously under the sinister influence of the Duke of Northumberland. That Dudley by his ambitious and unjust conduct, ruined what interest his children possessed, and ingratiated as were the measures of the princess Mary, even she contrasted favorably with Dudley. From the features of the times, it is rather a matter of wonder that princess Jane, or Jane no more more to the throne of England remained in quiet seclusion. Frances, Duchess of Suffolk, was alive, but yielded her pretensions in favour of her daughter, and by permission contributed to the catastrophe. The Dudleys, already in possession of one competitor, laid their plans to secure two of the others, Mary and Elizabeth, but the former in particular. The fidelity of the Earl of Arundel, saved Mary, who fled to Framlingham in Suffolk, in order to secure a safe retreat in Flanders, in case her cause became hopeless in England.

Mary, now in fact Queen of England, had a powerful resource in her own strength of mind. She had reached the maturity of thirty-years, and acted for herself, by at once writing orders in the form of letters to the nobility, gentry, and officers of the Kingdom, commanding them to assist her in defence of her crown and person.—Dudley had kept secret as long as in his power, the death of Edward. That event had been communicated to Mary by Arundel, and she despatched a messenger to the Council, informing them of her knowledge of the event, wrote with the same and confidence of Queen, ordered them to proclaim her in London, and on their compliance promised pardon for past offences. These steps brought the contest to issue. Mary reposed on the true and never failing character of the English, to sustain the laws and to be faithful to those who put forth their confidence. Dudley did many pay for their fidelity; but so justly did Mary appreciate the nation that her place of refuge was chosen amongst the Protestants, who flocked to her standard. A fleet sent round by Dudley to watch the Suffolk coast, the commanders of which taking care should be forced into Yarmouth, where they declared for Queen Mary.

In the coming tempest, where was the innocent, lovely and unambitious Lady Jane? At Sion House enjoying the company of her husband, or in the pursuit of the pure pleasures of domestic and literary life. Her father-in-law and father, in the pursuit of the temporime, had broke through all restraint, and prepared to proclaim her as Queen Jane. Dudley, therefore, with her father the Duke of Suffolk, the Earl of Pembroke, and some others of the higher nobility proceeded to Sion House, and approached her with the usual marks of respect then practised in the royal presence. She had been kept ignorant in a great measure of the pressure of events and at her age interested in scenes more congenial to her year and disposition, the supposition of her elevation, was received with grief and surprise. Blandishments of every kind were thrown round her, to overcome the suggestion of reason and prudence, and it may be remarked to her honor, that of the whole party at Sion House, she was the only one who acted and spoke with coolness, and sense and reflection. She refused to accept the crown and sceptre, when laid at her feet; behold her friends, among whom were her father and mother, with tearful eyes, pleaded the preferable title of the two princesses Mary and Elizabeth, expressed just dread of the consequences attending a dangerous if not criminal enterprise; and desired to remain in the private station in which she was born. The net was, however, too strong to be broken by a child under seventeen, and her better sense and feelings were led captive by the entreaties of a father, father-in-law and youthful husband. She stooped to pick up the empty baubles, and sealed her own and the ruin of her family.

According to the custom of the age in England, Jane, now treated as Queen was led in state to the tower of London. The Council were compelled by Dudley to attend her to that fortress; now in reality their prison. Orders were issued by the Council to proclaim the new sovereign, but obeyed only in London, and there, with astonishment, or some appearance of course and contempt on the part of the people.

In the interim, Mary and her officers were actively preparing to accept what they expected to be a during rebellion. The Duke of Northumberland so long blinded by false views of ambition, at length saw the gulf opening beneath himself and family, he was in earnest, but he was the dupe of his own artifices, and he could not retreat. He sent to Mary, but he was too late. The first blow struck, was the defection of a considerable part of his troops. Sir Edward Hastings, who had received a commission to arrest Mary for Lady Jane, joined Queen Mary with his thousand men.—The western men, in the hour of trial, without perhaps a single friend against him, were probably persuaded to march in opposition against Mary.—This step was decisive. All every method before the Queen's troops, without offering resistance, seized the Council and the Tower, and headed by the Earls Arundel and Pembroke, issued orders to the Mayor and Aldermen of London to proclaim Queen Mary, orders which were with alacrity and received on the part of the citizens with shouts of applause. Dudley was seized in the Tower, pitched in a fever, he could not resist, opened the gates and declared for the Queen and his daughter, the victim of the folly and crimes of those who sought to have been her guardians, advisers and protectors, throw down the trappings of royalty, with far more relief than it is probable she ever felt from the performance of any other act of her short but eventful life.

The cause of so much misery and adversity to his own blood, deserted by all, and as has been stated, insulted by some of his followers, when he had retired, fled to Cambridge, (the seat of the ancient parents) Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, fell on his knees to the Earl of Arundel, sent to arrest him, and abjectly begged his life. If this part of his history is true, which from his acknowledged dissimilar character we may regard with some surprise, tenderness for his children no doubt had broken his spirit. He had four sons involved in his ruin, one of whom, Lord Guilford, the husband of Jane Grey, was evidently doomed to death. He had when his fortune became utterly desperate, proclaimed the queen with every outward mark of joy and satisfaction. The guilt and character of Northumberland, for vengeance and ambition, were, nevertheless, too marked for Mary to admit hesitation on her part, and his sons convicted, and committed to close custody.*

Mary, though naturally a great was not a cruel tyrant, and therefore without a spark of clemency, the early part of her reign was marked by acts, which, if the motives could be doubted, would appear really magnanimous. "But Mary," says Hume, "was destitute in the beginning of her reign, to acquire popularity by the appearance of clemency; and because the counsellors pleaded constraint as an excuse for their treason, the extended her pardon to most of them."

The Duke of Suffolk, the father of Lady Jane, was released from prison, though entertained of his capacity. Most of the other persons implicated were consigned under various pretences. The indeed reserved for future vengeance. The guilt of the Duke of Northumberland was only to be atoned for with his blood. When arraigned, he plead the authority of the great seal, and desired permission to ask one question, which when asked, must have excited remorse in the hearts, and brought blushes into the face of some of his judges, if hardened politicians ever could be made to harbor remorse, when their own personal safety is secured, or their fatal shafts for any act not followed by punishment. The questions were, whether a peer could be guilty of treason for obeying the great seal; and whether those who gave it, could act as his judges?

His objections were overruled, and knowing his defence useless, he plead guilty, was condemned, and with Sir John Gates, and Sir Thomas Palmer—two unprincipled instruments of his power and ambition—suffered August 22nd, 1553.

Mary Tudor, now acknowledged Queen, afforded one of the many instances of the folly of making promises, and the difficulty of confining to promises, made by persons in opposition to their education and habits of mind. This woman was notoriously ignorant of every duty of a magistrate; a tyrant by nature, and a bigot by education, and yet, but days sufficed to rule in principles directly at variance with every tenet of her belief, were in direct opposition. It is true, that in pardoning the Duke of Northumberland by the hands of his own fortunate, was exercising double justice, and was really an act of mercy, but, nevertheless, in future acts of retributive vengeance and cruelty, which rapidly followed each other, and rendered the reign of Mary, a blood-written house, of the madness of delegating unlimited power in a single hand. We see the same unlimited power, from the notorious fact, that there existed in England, no check on royal power, during the period of the Tudor dynasty, which protected individuals from executive vengeance. So strong was the prerogative, and so extensive the influence of the crown, that though a majority of the Parliaments in 1558, at the accession of Mary, were inclined towards, if not actually professed secretly of the reformed doctrines, yet, in succession Parliament was elected, and gave the clergy of loyalty to the most numerous acts of blood and of oppression.

Commencing with some popular show, this Parliament repealed by one vote, all the statutes of Edward VI. in favor of the reformed religion, and all the fury of obstinate zeal, and exhilirated revenge let at once loose. As long as the arm of power reached only the higher prelates and heads of the aristocracy connected with the Dudley family, the measures might be regarded as acts of retaliation in a doctrinal contest; but the carnival of the unoffending Lady Jane Grey, roused a feeling of sympathy, which has drawn from any other of her sex of cruelty, to blast the fame of Queen Mary. Lady Jane and her husband were both condemned at the same time with the Duke of Northumberland; but their youth and the undeniable fact, that Lady Jane disapproved of the proceedings of her family, and willingly retired to private life, stayed the sword hand of her successful rival. But, from the character of Mary, it is probable she never for a moment really intended to pardon her cousin, but had policy enough to await a plausible excuse for acting the tragedy, which excuse was soon afforded, and promptly seized.

Early in 1554, Sir Thomas Wiatt, a Roman Catholic nobleman, taking advantage of public discontent, issued a declaration against the marriage of the Queen with Prince Philip, son to the Emperor Charles V. This match was opposed rationally and politically by Englishmen of all sects; but there was at the time so little private confidence, and so much court subserviency, that no strong party could be formed against a government which few individually approved. Whatever might have been the views or expectations of Wiatt, he was defeated, compelled to surrender, and was tried, condemned, and executed.

As if preconcerted to involve Jane Grey in the consequences of ill-conceived and improdently conducted attempts, her father, the Duke of Suffolk, with his two brothers, Lords Thomas and Leonard Grey, left London, and made ad essay to raise the standard of revolt in Warwick and Leicester, nearly contemporaneous with the rebellion of Wiatt. Neither leader had either interest or talents adequate to the part they respectively assumed; and the Duke of Suffolk was dragged a prisoner to London. A remark made on the fate of the Duke of Northumberland applies with equal force to that of Suffolk, that but little sympathy is due to such men, and that their fall can be only regretted as involving their innocent relations. The Duke of Suffolk, despised as he was, lay unmoved whilst his daughter suffered the penalty of her father's guilt. Upwards of four hundred persons suffered death on the occasion of the detached but simultaneous insurrections of Wiatt and the Duke of Suffolk; but so much blood was insufficient to quench the vengeance of the Queen, and that vindictive woman had gained what she long desired—an excuse to sacrifice her cousin, the husband of that cousin, Lord Guilford Dudley, and, as she hoped, the princess Elizabeth. The latter had the happiness to escape the snares; but in the tragic Lady Jane and her husband were overwhelmed. In the late insurrections, the views of the parties were drawn towards the princess Elizabeth. This was perfectly known to the Queen, who otherwise hated her sister; yet Elizabeth escaped by some influence not clearly shewn by historians; the most reasonable cause assigned, was the interference of prince Philip, afterwards the husband of Mary.

When warning was given to Lady Jane to prepare for death, it came to her rather as a release from the pains of an uncheered life, than as a pain she dreaded. Her young affections had been wrung, anguish had cast a pall over her path, and the world had become a dark waste before her. The only being who deserved and shared her heart—her husband—was foredoomed to her undeserved fate. Seven months had passed in daily apprehension of the dreaded vengeance, when the wretched Duke of Suffolk was brought a prisoner to London, and his daughter ordered to prepare for death.

The character of Mary appeared in unrelieved colors on the occasion, when ready to shed blood that she must have known was guiltless of crime, and that blood that of her own family, priests were sent under pretence of tender mercy to the prisoner's cell, to harass her with eternal disputation. An unsolicited reprieve of three days was granted, in hope, as it plausibly expressed, "that she would be persuaded, during that time, to pay by a timely conversion, some regard to her eternal welfare."

She would not prefer to be the Lady Jane, intrepidly declaring what she deemed the truth in the most awful hour of trial, to the fame and infamous Mary Tudor on the throne of England? The day of trial came—the 12th of February, 1554. It came with all its terrors; and it seems to give the soul a powerful exertion of fortitude to contemplate this lovely woman in her eighteenth year, resisting on one hand the dearest pleadings of the human heart, and on the other, her mental eye glancing past the instruments of death, and fixed on the throne of eternal mercy.

"On the day of her execution, her husband, Lord Guilford, desired permission to see her; but she refused her consent, and informed him by a message that the tenderness of their parting would overcome the fortitude of both, and would unfit them for their minds from that constancy which their approaching end required of them. Their separation, she said, would be only for a moment; and they would soon rejoin each other in a scene where these affections would be forever united, and where death, disappointment, and misfortune, could no longer have access to them, or disturb their eternal felicity."

It had been originally the intention to impute to the husband and wife together, but hesitated as they were to shed, and subservient to power as they were, the latest companions of the people was still to be dreaded, and particularly in a case where youth, beauty, and innocence would have combined with noble blood. Counter orders were therefore given to execute Lord Guilford on Tower Hill, and Lady Jane within the verge of the Tower. Lord Guilford was led out in sight of his wife, who gave him as he passed, a token of her tender affection, and in a few minutes saw his headless body carried back in a cart.

The mind of the martyr was now beyond all fear or earthly care. She waited her hour in a tranquility unshaken by the horrors around her place of death. To Sir John Gage, constable of the Tower, who desired her as he led her to execution, to make her peace with God, she bestowed her table book, on which she had just written the lines, commencing, on seeing her husband's dead body, one in Greek, another in Latin, and a third in English. The purport of them was, that divine justice was against his body, but divine mercy would be favorable to his soul; that if her fate deserved punishment, her youth, at least, and her impriscence were worthy of excuse, and that God and posterity, she trusted, would show her favor.

"On the scaffold, she addressed the spectators, in which the mildness of her disposition led her to take the blame wholly on herself, without uttering one complaint against the severity with which she had been treated. She said that her error was not the having laid her hand upon the crown, but the not rejecting it with sufficient constancy. That she had been led astray through ambition, that through ignorance to her parents whom she had been taught to respect and obey; that she willingly received death as the only satisfaction which she could now make to the injured state; and though her infringement of the laws had been constrained, she should show by her voluntary submission to their sentence, that she was desirous to atone for that disobedience, into which too much filial piety had betrayed her. That she had justly deserved this punishment for being made the instrument, though the unwilling instrument of the ambition of others; and that the story of her life, she hoped, might at least be useful, by proving that innocence exposes to not great calamities. If they tied in any way to the destruction of the commonwealth.—After uttering these words, she composed herself to be divested by her women; and then with a steady, serene countenance, submitted herself to the executioner."

Thus fell Lady Jane Grey, in the flower of her age, a sacrifice to the folly of one part, and the odious revenge of another part of her own family. Her fine character stands in contrasting relief with the general character of the times in which she lived; but when the tribute of regret and admiration is paid to Lady Jane Grey, and our reason has removed its power of reviewing events independent of individual sympathy or resentment, we may enquire, what would have been the probable consequences had Lady Jane and Lord Guilford Dudley been confirmed at the head of the English nation? Before answering, or attempting to answer this question, we must be frankness that will, no doubt, at the first blush, startle many, that England was, under the whole of the Tudor monarchs, the most absolute government in christian Europe. Let us hear a writer, no indictment enemy to a haughtiness prerogative. After mentioning the death of Queen Mary, November 17th, 1558, Hume observes in his summary remarks, "The arbitrary proceedings of the Queen above mentioned, joined to many monopolies granted by the Princess, as well as by her father, checked the growth of commerce; and so much the more, as all other princes in Europe either were not permitted, or did not feel it necessary to proceed in so tyrannical a manner. Acts of Parliament, both in the last reign and the beginning of the present, had laid the same impositions on the merchants of the staple, as on their aliens; yet the Queen immediately after her marriage, complied with the solicitations of the Emperor, (Charles V.) and by her prerogative suspended these laws.—Nobody, in that age, pretended to question this exercise of prerogative. The historians are entirely silent in regard to it; and it is only by the collection of public papers that it is handed down to us."

Out of the comparatively few in the United States who read history, a majority, no doubt, regard Elizabeth as having corrected the abuses of her sister's reign; and yet, from all the evidence of history, this was so far from being the course of events, that of the two monarchs, Elizabeth most strenuously exerted her prerogative. In a Parliament sitting in 1571, thirteen years after the death of Mary, "A MOTION made by Robert Bell, a Puritan, against an exclusive patent, granted to a company of merchants in Bristol, gave occasion to several remarkable incidents. The Queen (Elizabeth) some days after the motion was made, sent orders by the mouth of the speaker, commanding the house to spend little time in motions, and to avoid long speeches. All the members understood that she had been offended, because a matter had been moved which seemed to touch her prerogative. Featured exceedingly quick of this delicate subject. For above all, that the Queen had a prerogative of granting patents; that to question the validity of any patent, was to invade the royal prerogative; that all favours, trade was entirely subject to the pleasure of the sovereign; that from the causes which gave liberty of commerce, abolished all prohibitions from the crown; and that the Prince, when he granted an exclusive patent, only employed the power vested in him, and prohibited all others from dealing in any branch of commerce."—Hume.

This philosophical matter proceeds to show the same caution, even in trifles, which guided the proceedings of delicacy, if discussions proceeded in a tempting vein, and concludes an example of prerogative and authority, which is on final reflection, "It is remarkable," he subjoins, "that the patent, which the Queen defended with such imperious vehemence, was conferred for the profit of four courtiers, and was attended with the utter ruin of seven or eight thousand of her industrious subjects."

In a previous paragraph Hume observes, "Religion was a point on which Elizabeth was if possible, still more jealous than of matters of state; she pretended that in quality of supreme head or governor of the Church, she was fully empowered by her prerogative alone, to decide all questions which might arise with regard to doctrine, discipline, or worship; and she never would allow her Parliaments so much as to take them matters into consideration."

"What then was the office of Parliaments?" demands our author.

"They might," he answers, "give directions for the due training of leather, or milling of cloth; for the preservation of pheasants and partridges; for the reparation of bridges and highways; for the punishment of vagabonds, or common beggars, &c. &c.

"The redress of grievances was sometimes promised to the people; but seldom could have place, while it was an established rule, that the prerogative of the crown must not be abridged, nor any mean so questioned or examined in Parliament. Even though monopolies and exclusive companies had already reached an enormous height, and were every day increasing, to the destruction of all liberty, and the ruin of all industry; it was criminal in a member to propose, in the most dutiful and regular manner, a parliamentary application against them."

In brief, "absolute indeed was the authority of the crown, that the precious spark of liberty had been kindled, and was preserved by the PURITANS alone; and it was to the sect, whose principles appear so frivolous, and habits so ridiculous, that the English (United States also) owe the whole freedom of their constitution.—Animated by that zeal which belongs to innovators, and by the enthusiasm which enthusiasm inspires, they hazarded the utmost indignation of their sovereign, and comprising all their industry to be elected into Parliament—a matter not difficult while a seat was rather regarded as a burden than an advantage—they first acquired a majority in that assembly, and then obtained an ascendant over the Church and Monarchy."

And what were the Church and Monarchy united, for they formed one body? A machine of tyranny and oppression. Legislative authority nominally in a monarch and parliament, but really in the former, leaving the latter to act as passive instruments. The Church as a part of the government speaking a language intelligible only to courtiers and correct judges; sustained by penal laws, the very catalogue of which excites a shudder.

Of the two Tudor queens, Mary had least disguise—perhaps most cruelty, but impartially speaking, that being most intolerable which was void of the ordinary bonds of Elizabeth in deceiving, and of conciliations among the people in her policy.

Would Lady Jane Grey have been able to infuse a portion of her own mildness into those around her, and modified, by moderating the age? She was married to a Dudley—and the history of that family under the various names of Dudley, Warwick, Northumberland, and Leicester, solves the problem.

CHOLERA.

Means of preventing the Extension and mitigating the violence of Cholera.

[CONCLUDED.]

In the year 1828, during the period in which the disease first prevailed in America, numbers of persons left the city daily; nevertheless, they did not carry the disease either to remote cities or to the nearest neighboring villages. In 1832 many villages removed from Cholera, and yet, in the greatest number, the disease came with the city—nay, the very first person, on the shores of the Wedge, where whole families and workmen sought refuge, when the disease was at its height. It was the same with many others, where not only families, but the adult, were removed.

Whilst the disease was raging at Boston, after numerous, limited nations, was drove away with, the intercourse between the city and the neighboring freights and villages was interrupted. For six or seven weeks there or five thousand persons were in the city every day, and returned to their homes. Many of them had communication with the houses of Sea-sick, and yet so many of the villages the disease did not extend. There not a single case occurred at Sherborn, which was nearer than Boston, and yet there prevailed every day to their country seats—the large towns of Marlborough, out of Boston, and the villages of Fisher and Needham, which join the city, and contain each from one thousand to twelve hundred inhabitants, equally escaped.

During the prevalence of the disease at St. Petersburgh, numerous and free communication was kept up between it and a village about 50 miles nearer distant, that of the Germans, and not a single case of disease occurred at the latter place.

Taking these facts in connection with the instances of exemption from the disease enjoyed by the villages in the vicinity of Boston, and yet suffering neither, and those nearer and the city of St. Petersburgh, we shall answer what value to attach to the statements of immunities of those and persons having protected them from Cholera. The fact of escape from the disease by no means implies a connection, in the mind of the person escaping, with the protecting means, the more especially when we call to mind the well known circumstances recorded by different writers on the East Indian Cholera, that in the very centre of extensive districts ravaged by Cholera, there are certain spots or patches of country, into which the disease no sooner enters, than it ceases to be contagious, and ceases to be fatal. Of the subject cannot be placed in a clearer light than by simply observing that, the instances of immunity from the disease where unusual intercourse had been observed, are in tenfold greater number than where intercourse had been imposed and non-intercourse enjoyed. Non-intercourse by military cordons and quarantine, do not even give an additional chance of escape.—Their tendency and effect are the other way.

There has not been found any appreciable difference between the fatal frequency of disease in those persons attendants, and those with the sick of Cholera, and the number of the former who have been attacked with the disease. If Cholera were then communicable, a large majority of the persons mentioned, ought to have had the disease—nay, in fact, it never really any of them entirely escaped. Those who were attacked were not in greater proportion than would have suffered from any prevalent disease whatever. At Moscow, five hundred and eighty-seven persons affected with Cholera, and eight hundred and sixty laboring under other disease, were placed out into the hospital of Orchola. The hospital consists of a single building, three stories high, commencing by above story of each, and the rest. The same attendants had charge of all the patients; the different species of furniture were distributed without distinction to the patients, and all their clothes were washed together by the same persons. Of the eight hundred and sixty patients above alluded to, not a single case became affected with Cholera, and of one hundred and twenty-three hospital attendants, two only were affected, a man and a woman, both of whom were discharged to the house from very irregular conduct, for which they had been committed.

Instances of contagion following constant intercourse with the sick, might be greatly multiplied both in India and Europe.

The women who washed the clothes of the patients in the hospital at Orenburg, were entirely exempt from the disease. A like immunity was enjoyed by the stewards who helped the patients in and out of the bath, rubbed their bodies, dressed blisters, &c. in different Russian and other hospitals.

The physicians assigned to the town hospital of Dunaisk, that there were five women always near the patients, eight men were employed in bathing and burying, nine second men visited the patients, of whom one was always in the room in the day time, two remaining every night; the one of these twenty-two persons R. H.

I have visited, says Dr. White, the Greenhead hospital, during the time I had the honor of being physician to that institution, under all circumstances of physical danger, and have breathed the contaminated air, and mingled the hours together; yet I, the attendants, the nurses, all equally escaped, have equally escaped. Not a single individual in the hospital or Greenhead, or in the city, was affected.

"The following is an abstract of other cases and transposition can perform in the sick chambers of India, in the way of preserving Europeans from the disease. In the case of the Cholera epidemic, there were two hundred and twenty-two persons, who were lodged in the same room, and who were all attended by the same persons, and yet not one of them was attacked with the disease.

SATURDAY EVENING POST

PHILADELPHIA:

Saturday, July 21, 1832.

To Readers and Correspondents.

Several others have been made, within a month or two past, by some individuals wisely desirous of any thing the newly finding, to impose articles upon us original which have appeared in other journals. In one or two cases, through inadvertence or over haste, and the character of all concerned, they have been successful; and the result is, that we have unknowingly given offence to some of the editorial corps, who justly consider this matter as infringement of their rights.

Some these impositions were detected, we have made more careful in future not the writers, and not entirely without excuse. They unquestionably deceive us by their ability, and the indignation and contempt of every honorable and generous mind will be their fate, as soon as we give their names to the public. In the hope, however, that on occasion of hereby will [illegible] to desist from such mean practices, we shall by by the [illegible] pen which we had not expressly for their use, until the off-set is repeated. We trust we may not have occasion to do it, but we cannot entirely shut the door from an attempt of the kind to make. We pity and scorn the insidious dishonesty of such, which must demonstrate such poor dribblers.

The poetry by "M. R. H." is tame and defective. The sentiment is creditable, and with a careful revision—avoiding a frequent conclusion, which the author has allowed—the piece might be rendered our patronizer.

R. C. G.'s "Morning Walk" is decidedly a form, without reference to his Latin, which stands strongly of tedium. There are some good points, however, in the piece, which induce us regret that the writer did not choose a better subject for his genius.

C. W. is fond for invention.

A title, by "Amy-L." we are obliged to reject on account of the confusion of language, evident in several paragraphs. It is impossible to arrive at the author's meaning, without a decided perversion of grammar.

"G. P." we beg to decline.

The "Reminiscence," by Dorsenne, we cannot insert, not either on account of incident or language. In both there appear unfavorable and contradictions, which compel us to lay the MS. aside, at least, till we have more leisure for an attentive consideration.

The favor from our Cheraland correspondent, is well adapted to the purpose. It will meet attention.

"Friendship," by H. M. Dodge, is on file.

E. is to the point; his verses shall have place speedily.

The insertion of the lines by "H." would do injustice to various other correspondents, whose articles, equally as meritorious, have been rejected the most of room.

The "Lost of the Heaven," we beg to return to the author.

There is among the dissolute and depraved of the city, we are pleased to say, a sensible reformation of habit. The startling fact that the drunken and licentious have every where been the first victims of the cholera, has opened the eyes of such to the impending danger, and many have entirely abandoned their demoralizing and pernicious practices. We see fewer instances of intoxication in the streets; riots and assaults are less frequent, and among those most prone to disorder—the inhabitants of filthy places—there are symptoms of a change. We trust that this reformation will be permanent. Providence, in allowing this calamity to visit us, has unquestionably in view, some object of good—perhaps to teach us a lesson of humiliation; perhaps to sweep off from the face of the earth those who have long been a burthen and a reproach; or perhaps by a display of his awful power, to turn the evil in hand from the error of their ways.—To all there is in this visitation of distress, a lesson of admonition, by which it should be the business of all to profit.

Councils should pass an ordinance prohibiting the sale of green fruits in our markets, which are now overstocked with them. Such a measure would be as effective as a preventive of sickness, as any military regulation which has been adopted. The great and unusual mortality among children last week, is to be ascribed to no other cause than that of indulging in eating green apples, pears, &c. Parents should be cautious in regulating the diet of their children, and eschew these things as they do poison.

The intelligence from Europe received by the late arrival at New York, possesses much interest. The Reform Bill has finally passed the House of Peers by a majority of eighty-four votes, twenty-two members only voting in the negative. In France, during the funeral of Gen. Lamarque, which took place on the 5th ult. a revolutionary attempt was made, which was not suppressed until several hundred Parisians were killed. Louis Philippe—the citizen king—was in a fair way of losing his head.

Mr. John D. Jeffries, editor of the St. Joseph Beacon, published at South Bend, Indiana, complains, in his paper of July 4th, of an outrage committed upon himself by a portion of the 40th regiment, Indiana militia. It appears that in his paper of a previous date, Mr. Jeffries made some remarks, insinuating that the main object of the troop in marching out, was an improper one, connecting with a money-making scheme; and implicating, at the same time, the courage of the men, in case of a combat with any tangible enemy. Upon the return of the regiment to South Bend—which happened the day after the publication of his offensive editorial—he was assailed in the street, and threatened with extermination unless he would consent to make a suitable apology. Not wishing to make so speedy an exit, he agreed to the only alternative, and immediately betook himself to his closet, whereabs penned a retraction of his former assertion. The retraction is, however, after the manner of editors, rather a reiteration of the charges, than an apology, and in that light we presume, it will be considered. The issue is not stated.

The Galenian of the 27th ult. contains some accounts of several recent skirmishes between the hostile Indians and detachments of the Illinois volunteers, which appear to have resulted in no great injury to either side. On the 8th, Apple river fort was attacked by 150 Sacs, who, after firing for about an hour, were beaten off with loss. Only one person in the fort was killed. Gen. Atkinson, with a strong force, was in pursuit of the main body of the Indians, at the last advices.

Near the village of Hudson N. Y. on Saturday evening last, as Mr. Adam Emerick and wife were returning in a one horse wagon, from an excursion, Mr. E. found it necessary to take off the halter from his horse, to tie a large spinning wheel he had in his wagon; just as he had taken off the bridle and the halter, the horse took fright at a Buffalo skin he discovered in the wagon, and set off at full speed, Mr. E. being unable by any means to prevent it. Mrs. Emerick, becoming alarmed, attempted to escape by jumping out of the wagon; in doing which her head struck with such violence on the ground, as to produce an instant vomiting of blood, and a discharge of blood from one ear; after lingering in a miserable situation through the night, she expired early on Sunday morning.

THE CHOLERA IN THIS CITY.

We are under the necessity of chronicling to-day, that a few cases of malignant cholera have occurred in our city. They were reported in the early part of the week, and, we are pleased to say, have not been followed, as in other cities, by an immediate and fatal increase.—To escape the pestilence altogether, we believe morally impossible, from the nature of the disease; but we have many strong and substantial reasons for supposing its desolating march here, will be comparatively light. Greater precautions have been taken in this city, in the way of cleansing and purification, than has been effected in any other place; the materials upon which the cholera usually operates, are few; the habits of our people are also a barrier against its approach, and fear, that powerful engine in extending its ravages, has but little influence over us. It will, therefore, we feel assured, not double our city, nor to any alarming extent, increase the number of deaths.

The Board of Health, at noon, on Monday, reported the following cases—

130 Centre st. N. L.—1 female	dead.
do. do. 1 female	dead.
120 St. John st. do.—1 female	convalescent.
91 Green st. do.—1 male	convalescent.
81 Mead alley, Southwark—1 female	dead.

The cases in Centre street, Northern Liberties, were the wife and mother of a Mr. Ferguson, who arrived from New York, about twelve days since, where he had been on urgent business. Immediately upon his arrival he was taken sick, and on Friday of last week he died.—His conversation during his illness was continually upon the subject of the cholera, and the fears of his wife were so operated upon, that without any development of unusual symptoms, she deemed it necessary to take medicine. Without consulting a physician she took sixteen grains of calomel on Saturday, and after exposing herself she fell sick in reality. A physician was sent for, who upon being informed of the circumstances immediately declared her case hopeless. She died on Sunday. The other took sick about the same time; was on the recovery when she imprudently exposed herself likewise, which caused relapse and death. The case in Mead alley, was that of a large and corpulent hardworking woman. She died in a few hours after the first symptoms manifested themselves.

At noon, on Tuesday, the Board of Health reported but one case of malignant cholera, a female in South street above Second, convalescent; and a doubtful case in Kensington.

No new cases were reported on Wednesday, Thursday, or Friday.

Thus far, therefore, there appears no just cause for alarm. Our citizens will, we presume, generally remain at their posts, and continue business as usual. This is the wisest plan that can be pursued. To leave the city, and incur the anxiety and fatigue of travelling, to escape the disease, is worse than madness, and is almost invariably attended with distressing results.

The ordinary cholera morbus and diarrhea are the prevalent diseases of the city at this time, which are managed without difficulty, if medical aid be early called in.

"Should the stock of the Bank principally pass into the hands of the subjects of a foreign country, and we should unfortunately become involved in a war with that country, what would be our condition? Of the course which would be pursued by a Bank almost wholly owned by the subjects of a foreign power, and managed by those whose interests, if occasion arose, would run in the same direction, there can be no doubt. All its operations within, would be in aid of the hostile fleets and armies without; controlling our currency; receiving our public money, and holding thousands of our citizens in dependence, it would be more formidable and dangerous than the united military and naval power of the country."

The above paragraph forms a principal argument in General Jackson's Veto Message, and a more absurd position was, perhaps, never taken by the most obscure logician. The President seems entirely to have forgotten, that in case of war, Congress have the power to confiscate bank stock and property of every description, hold under this government by foreigners, the instant the safety of the country demands it. It is a libel on the patriotism of our national legislature, to suppose this prerogative will not be endowed, when it becomes essentially necessary.

The President in his Message also complains that Congress have done wrong in pushing the Bank question at this session. This complaint is extraordinary, as he has himself, in every message, strongly urged the subject upon the attention of our representatives. Connected therewith, it is true, was a project for the establishment of a National Bank, or Exchequer, but so unpopular were his views in respect to it, that no member of either house, ever dared to risk his reputation by bringing the matter before Congress in business form. How exceedingly unjust is it, therefore, for the President to veto a bill which has been passed by Congress mainly in pursuance of his own recommendations!

We conclude in this paper the extract from the able Report of the Committee of the College of Physicians on the subject of the Cholera, which we commenced last week. The document is from the pen of Dr. Bell, one of the editors of the Journal of Health, a gentleman who unites to extensive Medical research, an accurate knowledge of the history of this particular disease. We commend the article to the attention of every reader.

Complaints of subscribers of miscarriage and delay in receiving the Post, have been unusually numerous for a few months past. We cannot ourselves account for these outcasts, as all papers are carefully done up and packed in strong wrappers, and delivered at the Post Office, as regularly as the day of publication arrives. Our friends in the South and West are assured that the fault complained of, is not ours. We have made frequent representations of these grievances at our Post Office, but the officers declare themselves unable either to account for the omissions, or to adopt any measures to remedy them.

The most natural supposition, in view of these complaints, is, that the Post is much admired by certain officers of the government, through whose hands it passes, and that they detain it to obtain a glimpse of the passing news. To this we should have no objection if our subscribers did not sustain great injury, and we much unjust reproach. To obviate all difficulty, if this supposition be correct, we promise such officers, if they will forward us their address, to send them the Post, gratis, so that they may avoid, in future, laying themselves open to a prosecution. If this request be not acceded to, and the complaints are continued, we shall try what can be effected by an earnest application to the Postmaster General.

The Sanitary Committee of the city meet at the Mayor's office, daily, at 12 o'clock, to receive reports from their officers and citizens in relation to the health and state of the city. The Sanitary Committee of the Northern Liberties meet daily, at 7 o'clock, A. M. at the Commissioners' Hall, in Third street, for similar purposes.

The observance of Thursday last, as a day of fasting, humiliation and prayer, was very general throughout the city and districts. The shops and public offices were closed, and business in a great measure suspended. Among all classes of citizens a deep sensibility seemed to prevail in regard to the objects of the day, and the attendance upon divine worship was unusually full. The various sects of christians held preaching and prayer meetings in their churches, some, three and four times during the day. Several of the discourses delivered, we have heard spoken of as peculiarly appropriate, eloquent and interesting. In all the churches prayers were offered up to Providence, that he would chasten the upflied hearts of his people, and in mercy be pleased to spare the inhabitants of our fair city, from pestilence and desolation. Many of the pious worshipers, no doubt, with a confidence that their strength was in the hands of one mighty to save, were emboldened to say with David—"when calamity visited me I cried unto the Lord, and he delivered me out of my distresses."

Most sincerely do we hope that the devotions of the day may infuse new confidence into the hearts of all—that fear and alarm may be banished from among us, and the morning of the people turned into rejoicing for the multiplied favors of God.

We have advices from Trenton, stating that the case of Hendrickson vs. Shotwell, involving in its issue the merits of the controversy between the Orthodox and Hicksite parties in the Society of Friends, has been decided in favor of the former. The Chancellor, Gov. Vroom, having been counsel for one of the parties, before his election, the cause was heard by Chief Justice Ewing and Justice Drake of the Supreme Court, both of whom gave elaborate opinions on the question.

Three notorious thieves, whose names are Peter Bonverian, John Sanford, and Avery Kelcream, were arrested in New York one evening last week. A quantity of stolen goods was found in their possession.

The soap and candle manufacturing establishment, in St. John near Green street, N. L. occupied by Mr. Daniel Elcan, was destroyed by fire, on Thursday morning last. It is believed to have been the work of an incendiary.

MEETING OF THE PEOPLE.

The assemblage in the State House yard, on Monday afternoon, convened in relation to President Jackson's Veto on the United States Bank, was the largest that has ever been known in this city for many years past. The members present are estimated at from six thousand to eight thousand. At four o'clock precisely, the meeting was called to order, by the appointment of officers, and the business proceeded with entire unanimity. A feeling of deep interest seemed to pervade the breast of every individual in the immense multitude, and to the remarks of the speakers, and the proceedings in general, the most marked attention was paid.

The officers of the meeting were generally original Jackson men, and the spoken Clay and Wirt men, who joined on this occasion, in reference to what they justly considered a far more interesting and important matter, than any connected with party feeling. Upon such a question as that of sustaining the Bank, all men may join, for all are directly or indirectly concerned in its continuance. As an expression of the sentiments of the people of Philadelphia, and we may add, of the state of Pennsylvania, upon a national subject of great interest, we give the proceedings of the meeting entire.

At a numerous meeting of the citizens of the city and county of Philadelphia, convened in the message of General Jackson, vetoing the bill for the bill renewing the charter of the United States Bank, and recommending the re-election of General Jackson as President of the United States, held on Monday, July 16, 1832, at 4 P. M. in Independence square, for the purpose of publicly testifying

DANIEL GROVER, Esq. was called to the Chair, and

James Harper, John E. Keen, Nathan Jones, Israel Roberts, John Maitland, Jr. Vice Presidents, and Wm. H. Hood and Chas. J. Jack, secretaries.

The object of the meeting having been stated from the chair, Josiah Randall introduced, with some pertinent remarks, the following resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we have read with astonishment, indignation and alarm, the message of the President of the United States, accompanying his return of the bill for rechartering the Bank of the United States. With astonishment, that the chief Magistrate of this country should wantonly trifle with the best interests of the country, and against the expressed wishes of a majority of the people.—With indignation at the injustice which distinguishes every part of this extraordinary document, and with alarm at the unprecedented and dangerous ground, which has been for the first time prevailed in the proscription of our government.

Resolved, That in the language, doctrine, tenure and purpose of that message, we perceive additional and incontrovertible evidence, that the opinions and actions of the President, are controlled by the influence of factious and designing men, who seek their own emolument in the prostration of the energies of the country, the constitution and the Union.

Resolved, That the principles of that message, if carried fully into practice, as they are sure to be upon the re-election of Jackson, would leave no man safe in the enjoyment of his property, or his life, in the hands of the individuals who, at the disposal of the city, the profligate and the vicious, would subvert every pillar of the constitution, and reprove every land mark of the law, and would substitute in its place, a state of perfect freedom and perfect equality, a system of anarchy and confusion, and misrule, usually terminating in absolute despotism.

Resolved, That in the tone and language of that message, we remember a determination on the part of Gen. Jackson, to be the President of a minority, to the exclusion of a free, paramount, and enlightened majority, to make every department of the government, and to arrogate to himself the high functions which the constitution has wisely assigned to the people.

Resolved, That the rejection of the Bank of the United States, the supposed stability of President Jackson upon the principles of protection to American industry, upon the nomination of the Supreme Court, and upon the independence of both Houses of Congress, have secured the just and honorable ends by which the people of Pennsylvania were connected with him.

Resolved, That the re-election of a President whose official path has been so strewed with his own violated pledges, and with the unexpected hopes of patriotic minds, who has thus wantonly trampled upon the interests of his fellow citizens and upon the Constitution of his country, would, in the estimation of the nations of the world, be a fit commencement of those which we cannot contemplate without a shudder.

Resolved, That we will use all lawful and honorable means, by opposing the re-election of Andrew Jackson, to avert this calamity—and we solemnly call upon our fellow citizens of Pennsylvania and of the Union, heartily and manfully to contend at the approaching election for maintenance of these principles, and the promotion of those rights, which the patriots of our revolution sealed with their blood.

Charles J. Jack offered the following resolutions, accompanied by some remarks subjoined to the contents. The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the veto of President Jackson by has thrown an utter disregard of the unanimous voice of Pennsylvania, expressed through her Legislature, and delegation in Congress, both with regard to the Bank, the Tariff, and the Currency.

Resolved, That the hospitality of General Jackson to Pennsylvania is as extraordinary as it is unprecedented, as it is not to be doubted that to her votes, prosperity, and permanent support, he mainly indebted for his elevation to the presidency.

Daniel W. Coxe offered the following resolution, which was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That the thanks of this meeting are due and are hereby tendered to the Hon. George M. Dallas and William Wilkins, Senators from Pennsylvania, for having, after a full discussion and deliberation being had on the Executive Veto to the Bill for re-chartering the Bank, continued to vote for the passage of said Bill; and that the Secretaries are instructed to communicate the same to those gentlemen.

Joseph Randall offered the following resolution, which was adopted by acclamation:

Whereas it is believed, that at this time a decided and unexpressed majority of the people of Pennsylvania are opposed to the re-election of Andrew Jackson, but owing to the division of his opponents into distinct and independent interests, the individuals constituting this majority may be defeated in their common wishes and desires. Therefore,

Resolved, That it be recommended to the people of Pennsylvania who are opposed to the re-election of Gen. Jackson, to the Presidency of the United States, to lay aside all minor prejudices and predilections, and to unite in one concentrated effort in support of an electoral ticket which will prevent the vote of the Electoral college of Pennsylvania being given to General Andrew Jackson at the next Presidential election.

On motion of John Price Wetherill, the thanks of the meeting were unanimously to the officers.

Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the newspapers of Philadelphia.

DANIEL GROVER, President.

JAMES HARPER, NATHAN JONES, JOHN E. KEEN, JOHN MAITLAND, ISRAEL ROBERTS. } Vice Presidents.

Wm. H. Hood, Chas. J. Jack. } Secretaries.

The Home Journal mentions that some workmen employed in the vicinity of that place, in digging a well, dug up a bee, which was imbedded in a solid layer of clay, twenty feet and a half from below the surface of the ground. It was in a torpid state when found, of a pale colour and extremely cold to the touch, but the next day appeared nearly restored to the full freedom of life and activity. Similar instances of reptiles being found imbedded alive in solid rock, have been authenticated.

The Jackson meeting in this city is to be held a call for a town meeting on Monday afternoon, in the State House Yard. It is addressed to all who adhere to the cause of the President—"Bank or no Bank."

From the New York Advertiser.

At Buffalo two deaths had occurred, which, as they occasioned much comment, the Board of Health investigated them, and ascertained the fact, a female, that the "seed of infirmities of the tenement, had had neither cramps nor other symptoms of Cholera," but that from the circumstance of the funeral procession passing in front of the United States Bank, at the usual hour of closing up, the closing of the doors and shutters were hoisted upon by the spectators as an evidence of dread of infection, and therefore with the true logic of parity, (which is pretty much the same here, and at Buffalo, and at Albany, and every where,) the cause was put down as one of cholera.

The other was reported by Dr. Cyrenius Chapin, as "a genuine case of epidemic cholera." Thereupon the Board of Health with the consent of the family of the deceased, ordered a post mortem examination to be made, which resulted in finding—

"The stomach, intestines, and the whole of the peritoneum, highly inflamed; the liver and its appendages perfectly healthy. The stomach, instead of the first receptacle of the water, which is said always to be found filled in cases of the cholera, contained most in large masses, pieces of dried apples, onions, green peas, green corn, and cucumbers and cherries. These last were swallowed entire and all and of this mass, all perfectly unpicked, the stomach contained three pounds and his cannot by actual weight!!

The man who had committed this excess, had previously to his decease been offered and used medical treatment. Hence the Board of Health reasonably conclude, that the intervention of cholera was not necessary to account for this death, and no other of any equivocal character had occurred.

On the evening of the 6th, the owner of a small grocery in Westfield, with another individual, while drawing liquor from a cask, accidentally brought the fire of the lamp in contact with the spirits, by which they were inflamed, the cask exploded, and the men were enveloped in the flames of the burning liquid, which were immediately extinguished by their being rolled in the sand, after they were badly burned.

"Gaspeee.—Such were the evidently pestiferous effects of drinking ardent spirits during the prevalence of the Epidemic Cholera at Montreal, that the Tavern and Grog-shops were ordered to be closed by the authorities. In Quebec the sale of ardent spirits is here quantities than a gallon is allowed on the recommendation of the Board of Health, on account of the Cholera.

A letter from Woodstock, dated the 10th instant, and received this morning, informs us that this city has never been more healthy than it is now. The writer, who may be relied on, declares that neither has appeared nor justly is reported that the Cholera had appeared there.

Florence Wilkins Schmidt has been recognized by the President of the United States, as consul of Hamburg for the state of Louisiana.

The half pay pensions to widows of officers, generals and privates, who were killed in battle or who died in the naval service of the United States, has been extended for a further term of five years.

There are said to be indications at the South of bringing Mr. Calhoun out for the office of candidate for the office of President of the United States.

The President has appointed John E. Kunz of Philadelphia, G. W. Crossley, of Tennessee, and Thomas McKee, of Mississippi, Commissioners under the Treaty with France. The appointments have been confirmed by the Senate.

The House and Adjourning of Congress on Monday, passed an order requiring all regulations requiring a quarantine on vessels arriving from parts of the Russian dominions and the Baltic.

Amusing Mrs. Cameron—We understand that a Mrs. Day, of Indiana county, Ohio, has been indicted for the murder of her husband. She gave him arsenic in his victuals.

A season of the cheap and dear in Washington county, in Ohio, was taken from series by the assessors, and the result shows a total of 30,347 sheep, and 1,669 dogs within that county.

The profits of a printing establishment in London, have been announced at 700,000 for the past year.

Emigrating.—Mr. Trollope, speaking of the spirit of emigration which actuates the American, says—"Could they, may be pronounced that any point of the globe had a bushel of dollars buried in it, there is no doubt that in about a month, or two, we should see a long caravan and road long direct to the spot."

The editors of the Courier and Enquirer state that their seven boat, having run out of provisions after a voyage of six days, ran to Rhode Island for supply, but was driven off, with a jug of milk and a few apples. These articles were tossed into the vessel from a small boat, and paid for at an enormous price.

The sinking of a complete corpse of stuffing in the Hartford Courant, by four cases of gunpowder after a voyage of six days, ran to Rhode Island for supply, but was driven off, with a jug of milk and a few apples. These articles were tossed into the vessel from a small boat, and paid for at an enormous price.

Cotton are said to be an excellent absorbent of an infected atmosphere. In cases of small pox, it is the practice of some physicians to dress and cover cotton in the department of the sick.

Tree Cancer.—The Indian of New Haven, with characteristic ingenuity, has discovered that it begins to make cancer patients for the destitute American, are numerous. Many of the leading inhabitants have opened their houses as places of deposit, and a collection was made in Boston, on the 4th instant, by a young lady's basket out of a stage, but bonnet, which was very large, caught by the door way, and there the lady, like Mahomet's coffin, the deposit hovered and sank, and relived by country lady's basket, and escaped.

A new manual Cabinet, was robbed and murdered near Hardinsburg, Ky. about a fortnight since. He was found mangled in a most shocking manner. No trace of the murderer had been discovered.

There were two cases of Cholera at New Brunswick on Sunday, one of which terminated fatally.

A violent thunder storm was experienced in Newport on Sunday afternoon. The house of Mr. Job Sherman in Thames street, was struck, and his eldest daughter was instantly killed by the lightning.

The good people of Maine, to keep out the Cholera, have closed intercourse with Canada by the Quebec road. Yet, we fear, it is highly probable that the Cholera, as great an atmospheric freaks, will pass over the heads of all such, and make a lodgement somewhere in the vicinity of Portland.

The entire of Perseus in the country employed in the manufacture of Prussic Acid, is estimated at 1000 and the manufacture of this poisonous substance is said to be carried to perfection, which, as we have heard, differs much and greatly preferable from foreign drachm, it has recently arrived at the old countries.

In Germany, the people are struggling hard for liberty. New journals have been established by associations for the purpose of pushing the enterprise, notwithstanding the great powers are trying all expedients. The Prussian dominions are another cause to suppose of to be involved in the contest.

The tide of emigration is flowing with unprecedented rapidity to the Western District of Tennessee. The Jackson Gazette says the emigration to the District has within the last year, increased nearly fifteen to the population an increase of at least 10,000 souls. Very few, great number of persons we have seen pass through this city recently, we are inclined to believe that a very large proportion of them are bound for the Indian State.

The City Council of Charleston have appointed thirteen gentlemen to assist the Board of Health in the business of the city, with additional powers; have placed $1000 at the disposal of the Board of Health; have authorized no assistance to the poor physicians, and adopted other measures for the relief of the distressed in the city.

Malignancy or not Cholera.—The Island of Great Britain contains at present about twenty millions of inhabitants. The Cholera has been "raging" there ever since the middle of last October, and yet it was a very well collected fact that in the last week there 2000 persons had died of it the date of the last accounts.

VOYAGE OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

When years with sorrow, toil and fear,
Our pilgrim fathers rode
Across the broad Atlantic wave,
To reach their blest abode;
Their custom upon often rose,
In fervent, ardent prayer
To God their father, friend and guide,
Who made their wants his care.

Often with evening's silent shade,
Slow stealing o'er the main,
And oft when morning's early dawn
Came glowing in the beams,
'Twas then from every pious heart
The hymn of praise arose,
And heartfelt thankfulness to Him
From whom all mercy flows.

Thus day by day each passing hour
Was in his service spent,
Who gav'd them from the mighty hand
Of their destructive bent.
Who brought them safe from dangers all,
And kindly led the way,
When they might quell their rising fears,
And bid them all decay.

Thither they bent their weather'd goat,
With every rising sun,
And to behold it was their hope,
Ere yet the day was done.
At evening, on the quarter-deck,
They flagged still in quest,
That they might but one glimpse obtain,
Ere yet they sank to rest.

Day after day the sun arose,
And day by day it set,
While by their sun dim'd sighted eyes,
No land was seen as yet.
Oh! who can tell the flood of joy
That o'er their spirits burst,
When the long welcom'd sound of "land"
From faltering tongue came first.

Soon did they gain the promised land,
And when they press'd the soil,
Upon their bended knees they pour'd
Thanks to the Lord of all,
For his protection on the deep,
His kind and guardian care,
Their sending after all their toil,
The land of many a prayer.

STANZAS.

When first I knew thee, (still my dear,)
I fondly loved thee too;
Apparent worth, my heart sincere,
Made me believe thee true.

Each charming smile thy cheeks had worn,
Then lingered but for me,
But now the cank'r thorns off, I mourn
To waste one thought on thee.

Thine image once came o'er my heart,
Like sunshine upon the storm;
But now its light must hence depart,
Where hence no more can warm.

That may smile, to others given,
My heart esteems no more,
Its love, pure as the blush of heaven,
No power can e'er restore.

It falls upon my withered breast,
But cannot raise it now;
The fondest love you once confessed,
Now leaves no quick'ning glow.

Oh! hasten then still to use been true,
As once thy lips confessed,
So power had seen, as I now do,
Things strange from my breast.

But time on fleet! hastened then—
The cost I need not tell—
Another's arms could not now,
Forever! fare the well.

THE MUSHROOM.

A gentle evening shower had poured a refreshing draught into the cup of every languid flower, and tipped the leaf, and strung the stem with drops like pearl and crystal, so that, when the first beams of the morning sun glared down upon the gay parterre, it seemed, as in a moment, lit up by myriads of diamonds, each blazing and bickering for fear of being outshone by some of its bright companions.

The flowers, thus enlivened and decked out with jewels, were lavishing their odors on the zephyrs that caressed them; and looked light and joyous as if they had never seen one of their fair company cut down, or known that the destroyer could come among them. They seemed as if, hailing this as the day of their creation, they were exulting in their new-found existence; and by gracefully waving and nodding, appeared to have just finished a dance to the music of the morning stars.

But, in the midst of their rejoicing, their attention was suddenly arrested and drawn towards the border of their territory, by a grave, and timid looking stranger, who seemed awe-struck at their presence, and was fearfully crouching beneath the garden wall. This was an humble Mushroom, who, alarmed, and confused, at finding herself shot up at once, from nothingness into a scene so new and beautiful, and conscious of her own uncouth form, was shrinking, as if imploring the earth whence she had just issued, to take her back from the gaze and glare of her pitiless beholders.

The effect which our little Quaker dressed foreigner's presence in the garden made on the floral tribe, was shown in ways as various as their names and hues: though all agreed in denying her a kindred claim; and, declaring that she was not a child of their common mother Nature, refused her a birthright among them. For this, the patient Mushroom would not contend. Aware of her own experience and weakness, and of the self sufficiency of the flowers, whose vanity had blinded them beyond conviction, she felt, that their pride could only be overcome by that meekness which is in itself invincible, where reason would only bring destruction upon their employer. She therefore kept her balance, and stood in her place; bearing without complaint, the abuse and contempt of all her gay scorners; while some of them blushed with indignation, and sent out their thorns from the stem, as a sign of their power—some looked pale with the shock she had given them—some showed that their hearts were incased in gold, and others were careful to display their purple robes, as badges of their royalty. The Mushroom did not envy them for their gay colours, or fair exterior. She felt, that with all this, there were signs, too, of hidden sorrow! for a tear would now and then, steal out from among the petals of the brightest of them, which, connected with their vain looks, filled her with pity. Yet she did not address them, feeling that the most tender sympathy, and the greatest kindness coming gratuitously from one like herself, were only a wasted offering. But, as an humble, isolated thing, who had none to commune with, or to understand the uncultivated expressions which she might utter in her native tongue, she thus soliloquized.

"O why did nature bring me then to light,
A thing unfit for use, unfit for sight;
Lone like her work, that like a piece from art,
Whirled out and trimmed exact in every part;
Unlike the graceful shrub, and fragile vine,
Nor branch, nor leaf, nor bud, nor fruit are mine!
No beauteous flowers will crown my humble head—
No balmy odours on the air I shed.
But here I'm stationed, in my sober suit,
With only top and stem—I've scarce a root;
Alike uncertain of my birth and end,
I know not whence I came, or where I tend.
Yet I will wait and trust; and ne'er presume
To question justice—I, a frail Mushroom!"

She had scarce ceased speaking, when the lord of the grounds sent his servant into the garden, who, passing by the flowers, approached her as the object of his errand, and thus addressed her. "Because thy worth, of which thou art thyself so unconscious, is of a more durable excellence than that of beauty, which flourished an hour and then withereth away, I am commissioned by my master to take thee into his mansion. These light daughters of vanity will, ere night, be shattered, and lie in pale fragments on the earth, to be trodden under foot; or lightened about, the latest playthings of the wind. But thou hast a precious essence, which I shall separate from the grosser particles, in a fine fluid, and carefully preserve it in a silver phial. It will be often brought to my master's table; and its rare and savory qualities will heighten the delight of his repast, and those of the guests who shall sit around his board."

SLEEP.

Oh sleep! thou sweetly, gently soothing power,
How like to thee, the Christian's dying hour,
When hopeless of a glorious morn, he lies
Upon a bed of death and calmly dies.

And what is fact is death? 'Tis but to sleep.
What though upon our beds the earth they keep,
Still we sleep on, all calmly in our bed,
Unconscious that mankind upon us tread.

Still we sleep on, until the glorious day,
When, bursting from our prison house of clay,
We join the universe in one shrill, joyous cry,
To hail the God who for our sins did die.

EXTRACTS

From the Private Letters of a Late Traveller on Europe.

CALAIS, 2d April.

We arrived here last evening from Paris, after having ridden the distance of 185 miles in 26 hours. As we have now got somewhat rested, and have viewed the fortifications of this city, so famed in history, and examined the balcon in which Blanchard and Dr. Jeffries crossed the Straits from Dover to Calais, forty years ago, I have seated myself comfortably over the fire at the Hotel Dessin, where Sterne staid when in Calais, and in the summer-house of which he is said to have written a part of his "Sentimental Journey." The garden is a most beautiful spot, and is well calculated to inspire sentimental feelings, though at this time it is too early for it to show itself to advantage.

The Straits of Dover are about 24 miles across, and separate two nations so different in feelings, character, and manners, as in language. It is strange that those two neighboring streams should have passed by each other for centuries without mingling their waters.

Dover, April 3.—We crossed over in the steamboat from Calais to-day, and have concluded to remain here to-night and go on to London in the morning. Dover is situated between the feet of two immense hills or mountains of chalk, which are nearly perpendicular along the coast, and present a section of chalk of some hundred feet in height to the eye of one approaching the city, which is a small, level spot at the base from which these chalky mountains rise. On the summit of one of them is Dover Castle, with Queen Elizabeth's pocket-piece, which they say can throw a ball to France. When Napoleon threatened to invade England, a very curious shaft, or well, with circular stairs from bottom to top, was cut through, near the edge of the mountain, down as low as the level of the city, by which it communicated by a subterraneous arch-way.—This was to afford an escape to the soldiers and inhabitants, in case of a defeat; for it is wholly impossible to ascend the height without such aid. It is a very curious work, and well worth stopping to see.

LONDON, April 5.—We reached London last night, after a delightful ride of about 70 miles from Dover. On our way, we stopped at Canterbury, 16 miles from Dover, and while breakfast was preparing, went to the Cathedral, where the Archbishops of Canterbury and many princes have been entombed. This is one of the most sublime edifices I have ever seen. I doubt whether France has any thing of the kind superior to it. It is gothic, and extensive beyond your imagination. We have not yet visited St. Paul's in London, nor Westminster Abbey. I presume these are superior.

April 14.—We have been in London more than a week, and have been very busy in visiting the curiosities of this great and wonderful city. Nothing fills the mind with more solemnity, or bespeaks with more eloquence the brevity of human life, and the infinite littleness of human greatness, than a visit to Westminster Abbey and the Tower of London. In the former, one beholds, in a thick congregation, the monuments of kings and princes, of heroes, statesmen, poets, and orators, with their marble images stretched in deathlike sleep over their earthly remains, that have centuries ago blended in indiscriminate fellowship with their mother earth. While in the latter, a long array of knights, squires and chivalrous monarchs, mounted on horseback, and clad in the identical armour that was worn by them in their lifetime, seem to greet the stranger. Thus, in silent review, these representatives of England's greatness and prowess, in different ages, pass before the visitor, and remind him how short and insignificant is the life of man.

This custom of preserving the identical armour of their kings gives the English a good idea of many of their physical peculiarities, which they could not otherwise possess. The sizes of their persons are perfectly represented by these suits of steel, which enveloped them from head to foot. Some of the equestrian statues are furnished with the same long, tremendous lances for tilting, which were borne in the tournaments in the ages of chivalry. Among other curiosities and relicks of antiquity, we were shown the axe with which Anne Boleyn, the unfortunate wife of the capricious Henry VIII, was beheaded; and a curious thing it is. By the figure of its shape, which I here draw, you will perceive it was made for the use of a left-handed person, which the executioner really was. Henry sent to France for him.

We have also visited the Tunnel under the Thames, and been nearly half across under the channel of the river. The work is at present about half completed, but suspended for want of funds, for which the proprietors have made application to the government. The tunnel consists of two arched ways, each sufficiently wide for carriages to pass, and for a side walk for foot passengers. The whole is plastered, white-washed and beautifully lighted with gas, and is quite dry and pleasant.

PERTH, SCOTLAND, June 15.—We are now seated in a charming saloon, with windows extending to the floor, and overlooking the broad stream of the river Tay, in Perth, where a magnificent stone bridge, with nine superb arches, stretch across it. While my friends are busy writing in their journals, I will give you an extract from mine, such as it is.

"May 26.—Left Dublin at 7 o'clock, A. M. in the stage-coach for Belfast, 89 miles. These Irish miles are formidable things, four of them making five of our English miles. Breakfasted at "Man of War's." Country barren and cold, for 20 miles or more; after that the soil is fine and well cultivated. Dined at Newry—reached Belfast at 9 in the evening. Went out in the morning to see the town of Belfast. It is an active, flourishing place, and rises in importance every year.

"The whole landed interest of Belfast is vested in the Marquis of Dongall, whose son has the title of Earl of Belfast.

* * * * * * *

"At one o'clock we left Belfast for Coleraine, distant about 48 Irish miles, where we arrived about dark. 28th—Took a post-chaise for Bush Mills, nine miles from Coleraine, and a mile and a half from the Giant's Causeway, the object of our journey. Stepped about half-way to the Causeway, to see the singularly picturesque ruins of Dunluce Castle.

"This celebrated castle was built upon a bold, abrupt rock, projecting somewhat into the sea, and entirely isolated from the main land, and scarcely large enough for the foundation of the huge superstructure, whose walls are in some places only a continuation of the perpendicular sides of the rocks which rises out of the sea more than 100 feet, and against whose immovable base the furious surges of the Northern Ocean dash themselves in vain. The only entrance to the castle is over a wall of inchen wide, which is built upon the rock, among scenes that chasm between the rock and the shore. And it is over this that the visitor must pass at a giddy height. The walls are yet quite entire in many parts, and several apartments, the flooring and steps of which was of stone, can be visited, but not those floored with wood. Indeed, one window lintel is all that I saw of wood which had survived the general decay of that perishable substance.

"There is one small chamber, said to be under the care of a banshee, or fairy, called Man Roe, who sweeps the room regularly every night.—Our guide-book says, 'this fairies originated in the fact that the floor does always seem as if just swept, an appearance which, no doubt, by the wind, which blows through this, as well as other apartments of the building.' But Man Roe had been very remiss the night before our visit, or we had come too early, for the room was only fairly but clean; it having become the haunt of unclean birds. Beneath the centre of this large rock is a vast cavern, passing through it, from the water to the room or chasm between the rock and the shore, which is somewhat higher than the water. Whether this was formed by nature or by art, it is impossible to say; but it furnishes a very easy communication with the ocean, should all intercourse with the land be cut off. This passage, about 25 feet high and 20 wide, forms a singular feature in this striking ruin.

From the Mirror of Taste.

BATHING.

"Even from the body's purity,
"The mind receives a sweet sympathetic glow."

While we are pleased to perceive the salutary care being taken by our citizens generally during the present congregancy, to produce a general state of cleanliness both in doors and out, it must not be forgotten that a proper attention to personal cleanliness is not to be omitted. Among the means used, bathing claims the first rank in importance. The waste of the human body passes off in the form of vapour or moisture through innumerable small pores in it; and it follows, when these are in any way obstructed, that one of the grand outlets of the waste of the body is cut off; and if it cannot find another passage by the bowels or the lungs, it will remain and corrupt the mass of the blood. Even if it do in the end obtain an outlet by the lungs, the kidneys, &c. it must first pass back again by the absorbents and the blood, and consequently a disease may be produced before it can escape. Under this view of the subject, it will at once be perceived, that one of the most important efforts of bathing is, the purification of the skin, and freeing its pores from obstruction. The waste particles of the bones, the muscles and the blood, which pass through the skin in the form of perspiration, are often arrested on its surface by dust and other impurities which, with the perspired moisture, unite and form a thin incrustation. If this crust, formed by dust and perspiration be not removed by washing and bathing, the absorbents instantly set about removing it; and to do this, it must be carried back again into the mass of the blood, which in nine cases out of ten will produce more or less derangement or bad health; but in bathing as in eating, we would beg leave to caution our readers against intemperance. "The players," said Garrick, "when they hit on a good thing, never know when to stop; they have enough of it." There is much good morning in the observation, and it applies not only to players, but to eaters, drinkers, and bathers. Occasional warm bathing is very beneficial, but its frequent repetition at this season of the year is attended with debility, and is consequently improper. Where frequent bathing is desirable, the cold shower is preferred to the warm bath. Cold, either in the form of air or water, is a stimulant to the skin, and consequently imparts new vigor to the respiratory functions. During the prevalence of the present storm, we should suppose that man would have the best chance of escaping a visitation from the cholera (if it should reach the city) who indulged moderately in eating and drinking, preserved the body regular, kept his skin clean by occasional cold bathing, avoided exposure to the morning and evening air, and maintained a uniformly cheerful temperament of mind.

The baths of Mr. Swain, South Seventh St., unequivocally one of the most splendid establishments of the kind in this country, furnish every facility and accommodation for this luxurious and salutary indulgence, and the high importance of keeping the skin clean during the present conjuncture of circumstances, we hope will not be forgotten by our readers.

For the Saturday Evening Post.

TO ——

Nay, do not thus, with thy pallid cheek, and eye sunk in despair,
Look wildly on my meagre form, for mic'ry too is there:
Thy heart is broken, well I know, there's anguish in thy look;
But turn thy face, my eye cannot that deadly sorrow brook.

The days of joy, the halcyon days of hope, of peace, and life,
The mountain winds have swept away, with storms and tempests rife:
Forever are they gone, nor left one gleam of hope to cheer
The frozen heart, with anguish filled, with sorrow cold and drear.

Once we were happy, once with love our mutual heart was filled,
And youth and innocence were pledged that our vows should be fulfilled.
That pledge was registered, by the breezes of heaven borne,
To the azure skies, where truth and love, the immortal blest adore.

Thy vows, oh heaven, with faith thy love with chastity
Another sought and gained thy hand, and calls the now his bride;—
With wealth not love, thy hand was bought, to grace a banquet hall,
And o'er thy earthly, in a glittering veil, love's mockery a pall.

But my, I'll not upbraid—go to thy husband's home,
Think not of me; without a guide, o'er distant climes I'll roam;
I seek not peace, but in the din of the contract's awful roar,
To forget the world—unfaithful hearts—devoutly hear's implore.

A TALE OF THE PLAGUE.

A young merchant in the city was seized with the symptoms of the disorder, just as the day had been fixed, which was to unite him with his mistress. Some difficulties had been thrown in the way of the union by a crabbed guardian; and many hours had not elapsed from their removal, and every thing been settled, (which the lover hastened to see done with the greatest impatience,) when the terrible spots appeared, that were to cut him off from a union with the uninfected. It is supposed that the obstacles in the first instance, and the hurry afterwards, threw his blood into a ferment, which exasperated the attack. He wished to make light of the matter and to go about his ordinary concerns, but the strangeness of his sensations, and the thought of the peril that he might bring to his mistress, soon made him give up this pretension. He said, that his horror first inclined him to cry aloud, to tear his hair, and dash himself against the wall of the room; but the thoughts of her again controlled him, and he resolved to go through every thing as patiently as might be, lest he should add to his chances of losing her. He sent her a message to that effect, bidding her be of good heart; and then in a passion of tears, which he resolved should be his last, but which, he said, seemed to give him a wonderful kind of humble support, betook himself to his prayers, and so to his bed.

He was soon left alone with none but an old nurse to attend him; but as he did not sleep, and the good woman, observing him tranquil, kept a great deal, he thought next day he might as well rise and go into the garden for a little air.

The garden, though in the city, was a very pretty one, and as it abutted on some ground belonging on one side to a church, and on the other to a field where they shot at butts, was removed both from sight and noise, and might be called even retirement. He found himself sheerlingly weak, and the air, instead of relieving, seemed to bring the weight of an ocean with it; but there was grass and roses, and he thought it would add to the grace of his memory with her he loved, if he died in so sweet a spot rather than in the house. Besides he could not bear to think of dying, in what he hoped would have been his bridal bed. These reflections made him again shed tears in spite of himself, and he lay down on a bench under a tree, wishing he could wait away in that tender fragrance.

The young gentleman guessed that he had laid in this way a good hour, during which he had a sleep that a little refreshed him, when he heard himself called by his name. He thought it was the nurse, and looked towards the house, but saw nobody. The name was repeated twice, the last time with the addition of an epithet of tenderness, which he knew could come from no such person. His heart began to beat, and his ear getting him truly to the voice, which he now recognized, he rose on the top of the wall opposite him, and under a tree which overhung it from the outside, his betrothed mistress, holding with one hand on a bough, and with the other supporting herself in the gesture of one who intended to come down. 'Oh, Richard!' said she, 'what a blessing to find you here, and nobody to hinder me! I have chanced them, and shunk away,—my love! my life!'

Our lover said, there had little words had a wonderful effect on him. With all her tenderness, his betrothed bride had never yet indulged it so far as to utter such 'unusual' words, (that was his phrase.) He said they seemed to give her a right to join him; and they filled him with such love and gratitude, that the very hanger of his illness became confounded with a bewitching pleasure.

He confessed, that the dread of her being infected, though it still recurred to him, was much fainter than before. However, he the more thought it was his duty to urge it, and did urge. But the lady had no such dread. She had come on purpose to brave it. In vain he spoke as loudly as he could, and rose up and began to drag his steps towards her; in vain he made signs for her not to descend. 'Dearest Richard,' said she, 'if you cannot help me down, it is but an easy jump, and do you think any thing will induce me to go back? I am come to nurse you, and make you happy.'

'You will die,' said the lover, in a faint voice, now arrived within hearing and still making signs of refusal.

'Oh no Heaven will bless us, cried she: 'I will not go back, mark me: I will not indeed. I cannot, much less now! I have seen you, and in that sickly grove. But I see you cannot help me down. You are unable. Therefore I come.'

With these words she made the jump, and the next minute was supporting him in her arms.—She put her arms round him, and took his reclining head into hers, and raising herself kissed him on the mouth, saying, 'Now I belong to you. Let me cool you on the bench, and get you some drink. I am your wife now, and your servant, and your nurse.'

Their eyes were filled with tears and the lover could only lift his hand towards heaven, as much as to say, that, they should at all events live there. Not being able to reach the bench, he sat down in the thicket on the grass. The young lady went to get him some drink, and returned with news that she had wished the assembled nurse, and sent her to tell her guardian where she was. Nobody expected him to venture to come and fetch her, and he did not.

He told the gentleman what had been particular from him, that this behaviour of his betrothed bride, put him in a state so new and transporting, that he conceived an alteration of his blood must have taken place, very speedily; after her return from the house; for though he could hardly bear his delight, he began manifestly to get better within an hour afterwards.—The lady never received the infection.

SONNET.

A positive gloom 'mid'st the gayest heart,
To see the dead in mute oblivion sleep.
To see the tear of unfeigned sorrow start,
From laughing eyes, pressed to sigh or weep.

To see the pleasaged mother, to her breast
Her first-born's corse in bitter anguish place,
And have no tender, unswerving kiss impressed
By cheeks lips upon her pallid face.

The withering poisons of the placid cheek
When death hath placed his icy finger there,
The sight, an eye, the shroud and coffin speak
More eloquent than words—proud man, prepare.

LITHOGRAPHY.

Lithography is the art of printing or taking impressions from stone.

It was invented by Alois Senefelder, at Munich, about the year 1796.

The father of Senefelder was an actor. It was his intention to have educated his son for the profession of the law; but this did not suit his tastes; and after his father's death, he attached himself to the theatre, and became an author. He was reduced to his circumstances, and being in search of some cheap way by which he might print his own works, he accidentally made the important discovery of the art.

His mother requested him one day to make out a bill for washing clothes; and not having paper at hand, he wrote the list of articles on a stone which he had prepared for the purpose of etching. Some time after, when he was about to erase the writing, the thought occurred to him, that by preparing the stone with aqua fortis, and applying printer's ink to it, it might be possible to take impressions from it as from wood engravings. He tried the and several subsequent experiments, and thereby was the art of Lithography.

Senefelder at first made his discovery a secret; but in 1799, the king of Bavaria gave him an exclusive privilege to practice his new art for fifteen years, after which he made no exertions to keep a knowledge of it from the world.

The art was introduced into England about the year 1802, and into France in 1807, by M. Andre, a musical composer, who dispensed of the secret to all who would purchase it for a given sum. His first attempts, however, at printing, were rather unsuccessful.

Count Lasteyrie distinguished himself by his exertions to advance the art. He visited Germany for the purpose of acquiring information, and while there, he engaged a Mr. Engleman to study the art at Munich; after which, in conjunction with several other gentlemen, he set up a lithographic establishment in Germany.

In 1816, Mr. Engleman opened a printing establishment in Paris, where he soon had six presses in operation. The art now assumed a considerable degree of importance; artists of ingenuity turned their attention to it and daily improvements were made.

Lithography was first successfully practiced in America by Mr. William Pendleton, about the year 1824.

The stones are prepared for drawing by having their surfaces made smooth and uniform. The lines are drawn by the artist with a composition made of tallow, wax, shellac, common soap, and lamp-black, the usual proportions of which are—tallow, 4 oz.; shellac, 1 oz.; soap, 1½ oz.; and lamp-black, 1½ oz. This composition, when undiluted, is formed into small rolls, and receives the name of crayon or grapic chalk.—When diluted with water, it is called lithographic ink, and in this form it is applied to the stone by means of steel pens or camel's hair pencils.

Drawings executed with the pen are the most durable, and many more impressions can be taken from them, than those executed by means of the chalk.

It requires a good deal of skill in an artist to make a fine drawing on stone. The subject may be traced on the stone with red chalk or a lead pencil, but it must be done very lightly. When drawing, the artist must vary the pressure of the hand according to the tint which he wishes to obtain; or he may obtain any gradation of tints by varying the thickness of the lines or the distance at which they are placed from each other. A scraper is used to erase all errors and to procure lights.

When a drawing is finished, it is carried to the printer, who pours upon the stone diluted nitric acid, which produces a chemical change upon its surface, and discharges the alkali of the soap which enters into the composition of the crayon and ink. This process is called etching.

The stone is then covered with a solution of gum arabic, which fills up the pores, and prevents the ink from spreading.

Previous to printing, the stone is wet with water, which is absorbed by every part of it except that which has been touched by the composition, for grease will not unite with water, while all calcareous stones possess the property of imbibing fluids, except they be protected by oily substances.

A roller is now charged with printing ink, and being made to pass over the stone, the ink readily adheres to the greasy lines of the drawing, but does not to those parts covered with water.—The impressions are obtained in the same way as those from engravings.—After each impression, it is necessary to wet the stone and apply the roller charged with ink.

It will be seen that the process of obtaining prints by lithographic engravings, is much less mechanical than any other mode, for it is founded upon a judicious application of chemical principles. The printers' ink being oily, readily unites with the oily composition which has been applied to the stone in drawing, while it rather will unite with the water. These are the general principles upon which the art is founded.

The number of impressions which can be taken from one lithographic drawing, when executed with the crayon, may vary from 300 to 1500, according to the fineness of the tints.

The art of lithography possesses many advantages over that of engraving. An engraving must be a copy, but a drawing on stone may receive many fine touches from the hand and skill of the artist. An impression from a copper plate can be transferred to stone by pressure, and then be printed in the same manner as if it had been originally drawn on stone. The process of transferring an engraving to stone is extremely simple. The engraving must be laid with its surface upon water, until it becomes thoroughly wet, when it is taken and applied to the surface of the stone, which has been prepared in the usual manner. An proof procure is now made by means of a roller, till the ink leaves the paper and adheres to the stone.

The cheapness of lithographic prints brings them within the reach of all classes of society, and the works of authors which require embellishment, are by this art reduced in price.

MRS FORSTER, or a Reverie on Foreign Climes.

Dedicated to Mrs. and Miss S of Philadelphia.

O how I long to travel—to survey
The land where towering triumphs ever stand,
Where genius hath in glory now grown gray,
And grandeur lifts her beauteous sublime;
The land of love, and luxury, and crime,
Where dazzling beauty dwells array'd in smiles,
And the rich groves of lemon and of lime,
Waft odours sweet as from the eastern isles,
The land of mine: where old Rome opposes,
Dimly amid the darkness of departed years.

I long to ride upon the roaring deep,
Across the billows of Athens brave,
To Albion's cliffs where genius may not weep,
Nor wisdom worship at her shrine forlorn;
Where science never yet was dream'd to mourn,
In dungeons for discovering the truth,
Nor Like a Galileo to have torn
The laurels from her temples to degrade,
Nor like a Cassens to be exiled,
And cross the sacred soil that cherish'd him a child.

In London's little world I sigh to stand,
And gaze upon the moving masquerade,
On her tall temples and her towers so grand,
Where many a cheerful drama hath been play'd,
Now funeral in story, where queen Mary pray'd
Her cruel kinsmaid's mercy, but in vain;
And Richard's soul a deed of blood essay'd,
A horrid deed too dark to do again;
Where lady Jane, to think on death retired,
And cruel Henry's queens in innocence expired.

Yes, I have sigh'd to move, but for one day,
In Westminster's famed Abbey, 'midst the throng
Of fallen heroes, kings now pass'd away,
And that congenial few the sons of song,
To whom those marble monuments belong;
And thence thro' England's confines, to survey
Those ancient castles, monuments of wrong,
And feudal grandeur—those ruins grey,
Where now the owl chants forth her doleful air,
Unmindful of the gaudy that once assembled there.

And I have long'd to press the silver sands
Of gay and gallant France, the land of mirth,
But more to be where princely Paris stands,
The mingled hotel of this bubbling earth;
Pandem's box where discord owns her birth,
And Fashion sits upon her gaudy throne;
The home of contrast—wickedness and worth,
'Tis peace and passive wickedness unknown.
Great seat of empire, variable as wind,
Dread scene of Bourbon folly and Napoleon's mind.

The standing jewel of the world she seems,
A grand resonance in which all hearts are,
And incidents are changing like our dreams,
From love's delight's to horrid sin.) war;
Now made a dungeon, now a freedom's car,
And now exiling her old tyrant king,
Then hailing a new monarch, but to mar
The picture of their own imagining.
While one hails young Bordeaux with all his heart,
One cries Republic, and another Bonaparte.

But most to Italy, fair land of flowers,
Where Beauty's pouting lip of love is mute,
I fain would fly there 'mid her groves and bowers,
And gayer gardens in their garb of green;
To gaze upon the grandeur of the scene,
That did to boyhood's dreams so bright appear,
Lovely as Eden of the earth has been,
For sunny morns and moonlight eves are here;
And surrounding goodness here glide,
Beneath some listening lady's lattice o'er the tide.

Sweet clime of clustering grapes and golden fruit,
What heart will beat not in thy classic plains;
Where Tully spoke, what tongue may dare be mute
Where Virgil sang, what harp may hush its strains;
And who to fame's proud temple o'er attains,
Can in Italia's galleries survey,
Of mourning and of art, the rich remains,
Achiev'd by genius in her proudest day,
Nor feel a glow of glory to admire,
The land of the illustrious and the living lyre.

In reverie I rove, to where old Rome
Still lifts her lingering head above her halls,
Once echoing eloquence, but now the tomb
Of former grandeur, glittering on these walls;
For there where now the crumbling column falls,
The mighty Cesars once applauded were,
Obedient to ambition's constant calls,
And where the Forum lies in ruins there,
Great Tully's tongue once thundered in debate,
And Cicero hig with the gathering storms of state.

Amid the ruins of old Rome, to sit
And dream, were bliss romance hath never known,
The scenes of ancient wisdom and of wit;
Perhaps the spot where once the world's proud throne
Stood deck'd with diadems, but now alone
Is fragments seen'd by the tooth of time,
The haunt of fleecy flocks—perhaps where shone
The Coliseum splendid and sublime;
Where once the ghastly gladiator bled,
And christian blood by tigers' teeth unwept was shed.

Venetia, to my soul thou bringest a dream
Of wonder, and amusement, and desire
Would I could die, thee where dreadful scream
Of liquid lave lies on some dire.
Gondolier'd there enter where one general pyre,
Saw thousands perish as poor Pitny died;
Dread Tempest, what eye to gaze would tire,
When thy awful tomb of wonders wide;
Thou that hast lain almost two thousand years,
Again appearest, or thy gloomy shade appears.

There are thy statues, but where the chariots now,
And those who drove them, and the crowds of old,
Alas, their death-like form and sickless brow,
May still be seen, still clinging to their gold;
As in the final hour, when silver told
The coming doom, and continued them to fly,
And thro' the wine cup stands, the vast grown cold,
And silence landed with their luxury;
There too the gay assembly point is seen,
With all its painted glories and its gaudards green.

Unlike the ruin'd Carthage, and the fall
Of Greecian glory in old ocean seen,
There as they came were seen, are now seen all
The objects that in ages past have been,
The same that they are now, a link between
The people of the present and the past,
So strange that time appears but as a screen,
Dividing us from that dread inter agitant;
To than too Heaven-born, I fain
Would bend my weary steps and meditate again.

Genoa, glorious Genoa, thou bringest to the soul,
The memory of thy monuments of mind,
The tenets of all thy tales, till control
In vain to cool, the wish, that is inclined
To stray in shades where Sorrow could find
Instruction, and where Pluto often stay'd
To gaze upon Persephone, where reclined
The maiden mourn in their flowery shade;
Ay, and to ponder wonder on that clime,
In song and other wisdom sent of all sublime.

MILFORD BARD.

CURIOUS PARTICULARS OF DR. JOHNSON'S MARRIAGE.—The artless manners, and rustic prettiness of Lucy Porter, had won Johnson's youthful heart when she was on a visit at the Rev. John Hunter's, Master of the Free School, Litchfield, in Johnson's youthful days. The peculiar appearance, however, of Johnson, could not tempt the lady to a return of his passion; and at length she returned to her parents at Birmingham. Business requiring Johnson's presence in that neighborhood on the death of his father, and calling upon his former mistress there, he found her parent dying. With that affectionate friendship which particular attentions always experienced from him, he passed all his leisure hours at Mr. Porter's, attending his sick bed, and a few months after his death, asked Mrs. Johnson's consent to his marriage with the widow.

Mrs. Porter had been spoken of as very fat, with a red face, and indifferent features, and in her speech and manners affected, and bordering on girlish levity; while Johnson, on his first introduction to her, exhibited an appearance yet more singular. He was then lean and lank, so that his immense structure of bones, was hideously striking to the eye, while the scars occasioned by the scrofula, were deeply visible. His hair, which was straight and stiff, he wore separated behind, and he often had, seemingly, convulsive starts, and odd gesticulations, which tended to excite at once surprise and ridicule. Mrs. Porter, however, was so much engaged by his conversation, that she overlooked all those external disadvantages, and expressed to her daughter "this is the most sensible man that I ever saw in my life."

Johnson's mother, as might naturally be expected, expressed her surprise at a request so imprudent and extraordinary, both on account of their disparity of years and her want of fortune.

"No, Sam," said she, "my willing consent you will never have to so preposterous a match. You are twenty-five, and she is turned of fifty. If she had any prudence, this request would never have been made to me. Where are your means of subsistence? Porter has died poor, in consequence of his wife's expensive habits. You have great talents, but as yet have turned them into no profitable channel."

"Mother," replied Johnson, "I have not deceived Mrs Porter: I have told her the worst of me, that I am of mean extraction; that I have no money; and that I have had an uncle hanged! She replied that she valued no one more or less for his descent; that she had no more money than myself; and that though she had not had a relation hanged, she had fifty who deserved hanging."

After some little lapse of time, however, matters were brought to a conclusion, and Derby was fixed on as the place where the ceremony should be performed, (on the 9th July, 1736,) for which place the bride and bridegroom set out on horseback. The singular account of their journey to church, on the nuptial morning, is given by Boswell, in the Doctor's own words to him: "Sir, she had read the old romances, and had got into her head the fantastical notion that a woman of spirit should use her lover like a dog. So, Sir, at first she told me that I rode too fast, and that she could not keep up with me; and when I rode a little slower, she passed me, and complained that I lagged behind. I was not to be made the slave of caprice; and I resolved to begin as I meant to end. I therefore pushed on briskly till I was fairly out of her sight; the road lay between two hedges, so I was sure she could not miss it; and I contrived that she should soon come up with me; when she did, I observed her to be in tears."

This, it must be allowed, was a singular beginning of connubial felicity, yet he proved a most affectionate and indulgent husband to the last moment of her life. He once told Topham Beauclerk with much gravity; "Sir, it was a love match on both sides;" and in his "Prayers and Meditations," we find very remarkable evidence that his regard and fondness for her never ceased, even after her death.—Boswell's Life of Johnson.

As important debate took place, on the 24th May, in the British House of Commons, touching the abolition of negro slavery in the West Indies. A committee on the subject was appointed, and great efforts will be made to accomplish the design of immediate emancipation. We take, as a specimen of the tone of the abolitionists, the annexed passage of a speech of Mr. O'Connell in the debate.

"He thought that the present was a time peculiarly favourable to the consideration of the question, and he strongly recommended those who advocated the West India interests to take advantage of the existing temper and condition of the House, to secure for themselves terms which they could not expect from a House of Commons so popularly constituted as they might rest assured the next House of Commons would be. No candidate could hope to enter a reformed House of Commons unless deeply pledged to the emancipation of the negroes. In England the question had been recently settled; in Ireland it had long been. No Irish Member would support the system which made one man the property of another. Much had been said of the difficulties attendant upon any attempt to settle the long-contested question of negro slavery; but to his mind it did appear that the difficulty lay, not in the abolition, but in the continuance of slavery. The time had at length arrived when the House ought to express its determination to emancipate the negroes of the West Indies, and set to the Spaniards and the Americans such an example as would render it impossible for those States to continue the abominable system any longer. If the House were not already convinced of the justice and expediency of conceding emancipation, he felt that at that time of day it would be needless for him to press it further upon their attention.

Such are the numbers, the intelligence, and the political power of those by whom this earnest hope, or rather we may say this settled purpose, is entertained—such above all, is their weight of character and moral influence in the community, that, in the words of Lord Goderich, it will be a fatal illusion to suppose that the abolition of slavery can be long averted. To prolong a contest, of which the result cannot but be unfavorable, will only add to the final amount of that distress, which the West India proprietors have already brought upon themselves by their obstinate adherence to their own vicious policy.

In the course of the debate, Mr. Hunsore lated the following anecdote, which is probably new to most of our readers.

He begged to state an anecdote to the House respecting General Washington, who acted so imprudently as to give, to his will, freedom to his slaves, but with one condition—viz. not until the decease of Mrs. Washington. It is hardly necessary to say that Mrs. Washington was advised not to go to bed that night before she had emancipated the whole of the slaves—(hear, and laugh.)

SONG OF DEATH.

The servant of heaven, but the monarch of earth,
The death of creation is that of my birth,
My office eternal, extensive my sway,
Despotic I rule o'er the creatures of clay.

From the moment the embryo wakens to life,
Its footsteps untow'rd with perils are rife,
And often while fresh from the hand of its God,
The blossom of infancy falls at my nod.

The vigor of youth is but impotence found,
When my influence, fearful, is scatter'd around,
And of manhood the strength can no longer avail
When I, the destroyer, his vitals assail.

No pity is spent on the weakness of age,
But remember he's buried from life's transient stage
And beauty, which often man's destiny sways,
In my breast not a moment's compunction can raise.

The proud and the humble, the lord and the slave,
I level alike to the realms of the grave;
Nor any grasp can cloak me my visit postpone,
In the peasant's rude hut or the monarch's high throne.

By ministers mighty my mandate are sped,
And legions are called to repose with the dead
War whom them forth, and slaughter and strife,
Or pestilence closes the portals of life.

Ye should earth exult in the blessings of peace,
